

Uncovering Our Local Social Studies / History with Ellie the Elephant

Be a Time-Travelling Detective: Explore the Secrets Beneath Our Feet!

- Local history is the study of how a specific place has changed, from its earliest settlements to the bustling town or village we see today.
- Buildings are like stone storybooks; by looking at the style of windows, bricks, and roofs, we can tell which century a house was built in.
- Primary sources, such as handwritten diaries, census records, and old maps, provide us with authentic evidence about the people who lived here before us.
- Place names often hold clues; for example, a name ending in '-ton' or '-bury' often tells us that there was an ancient settlement or fortified camp on that site.
- Museums and local archives are vital treasure chests that preserve our heritage, keeping our shared story safe for future generations.

Did you know? Did you know? Ellie the Elephant has a remarkable memory for history! She once discovered an old Victorian coin worth £5 in today's value buried in her garden. Finding small objects like coins, broken pottery, or old newspapers helps us piece together exactly how people lived in our town hundreds of years ago.
