Long ago, a prince named Siddhartha Gautama lived in a palace filled with luxury. Despite his riches, he felt curious about the suffering he saw in the world outside. He decided to leave his life of comfort to search for a deeper meaning to life. After years of travel and deep meditation under a Bodhi tree, Siddhartha reached a state of perfect understanding known as Enlightenment. From then on, he was known as the Buddha, or the 'Awakened One'.

Buddhists believe that by following the Eightfold Path, which encourages kindness, honesty, and mindfulness, people can live peacefully and help others. Today, many Buddhists visit a temple or a quiet home shrine to reflect and meditate. They believe that showing compassion to all living things is essential. Unlike some religions that focus on a creator god, Buddhism focuses on the individual's journey to find inner peace and clarity. By training the mind through meditation, followers aim to let go of greed and anger, choosing instead to act with patience and generosity toward everyone they encounter in their daily lives.
