Non-Chronological Report Explorers with Max and Pip

Learning objective: To identify and understand the features of a non-chronological report to help with writing non-fiction.

Use these flashcards to test your knowledge of non-chronological reports. Read the term or question on the front, then flip to check the answer on the back.

What is a non-chronological report?	A piece of writing that gives information about a specific topic without following a time order.
What is the purpose of a heading?	To tell the reader exactly what the whole report is about.
How do sub-headings help the reader?	They break the text into smaller sections to help the reader find information quickly.
What is a fact?	A piece of information that is true and can be proven.
What does an introduction do?	It gives a brief overview to hook the reader and explains what the topic is.
What is a caption?	A short sentence written under a picture or diagram to explain what is happening.
Why do we use bullet points in a report?	To list information clearly so it is easy for the reader to scan and understand.
What is a technical word (or glossary term)?	A special word linked to the topic that might need a definition, often found in a glossary.
Does a non-chronological report tell a story in order?	No, it is organised by theme or topic, not by time.
What is the main goal of a non-chronological report?	To inform the reader about a subject in a clear and organised way.
